445 12th Street, SW
Washington, DC 20554*

Dear Chairman Pai and Commissioners Carr, Clyburn, O’Rielly, and Rosenworcel:

As business members of Voices for Innovation, a community of technology supporters, we are writing to urge the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to preserve in all U.S. markets three channels of TV white spaces spectrum for wireless high-speed internet.

This innovative technology will open the doors for bringing affordable broadband to 34 million Americans, mostly in rural communities, who lack internet access.

To encourage private sector investment in this long-distance broadband technology, the FCC must establish supportive TV white spaces rules. Using this spectrum, wireless connectivity will be able to reach many miles, compared to Wi-Fi’s approximately 100-325 yards.

Today, information technology, especially cloud computing services, supports the operations of all economic sectors. It also plays a critical role in helping many small businesses launch and grow.

But without internet access, the operational benefits of cloud computing are not available to many American businesses, especially in rural areas. The lack of internet connectivity also hurts small tech businesses that stand ready to meet the needs of this important customer base. All American communities—not just those tied to metropolitan areas—should have the internet infrastructure needed to support business starts and expansion.

Internet access will also support workforce development. Students in rural areas will have greater educational opportunities when they can access information and services online. Displaced workers will be able to develop new skills through cloud-based training—when they can finally access the internet.

It is time for our nation to close the digital divide. Once again, we urge you to make three channels of TV white spaces spectrum available for broadband connectivity. Thank you.
